The new quartet is a welcome addition to our list of chamber music acquaintances. It cannot be said to have "arrived" yet, but it has gone far on the way. It has plenty of tonal power and any quantity of vigor. It has excellent precision and unanimity, and its intonation is generally good, though it is not perfect and is subject to periods of atmospheric disturbance.

There is a great deal of warmth in the quartet's playing, but the quality yet wanting is balance, without which, of course, perfection of ensemble is impossible. Possibly Mr. Hest is a trifle too enthusiastic and pushes his individuality too far to the front. However, quartets do not get ripe in one season, and the Boston Symphony Quartet may mellow in another year. The Slanderers

Warwick Deeping, whose "Uther and Igraine" is remembered as a fascinating bit of Arthurian romance, has here set his poetry in a framework of fact. His new novel has a modern setting-a little gossiping village community where the tongue of slander does its worst, bringing about an unusually interesting situation. The tale has its poetic side as well, turning to English fields and hedge-rows and depicting an idyllic love affair with all the charms of Mr. Deepings winning style. The author has brought romance into modern life without sacrificing the reality of one or the charm of the other.
